Download Lagu, My little pony sonic rainboom (ft.Cathy Young writes about the fight for gender equality in today's NY Times: Remember last week's outrage about a scientific study? Well, here we go again. This time, it is about sex-based pay discrimination. No, not women's pay, which is difficult to study precisely because women make up about half of the workforce. Women's pay is not the problem in this case. No, the attention of the researchers has focused on wages for working men and, in particular, their willingness to accept lower pay for their work. Most news reports, including those in Slate, have emphasized the findings that men were more likely to accept lower pay than women. The Washington Post's headline called the study "researchers find widespread discrimination against men at work." But the researchers weren't looking at pay rates for men versus women. They were looking at how much men and women accepted to take a pay cut. Some 5 percent of working men have a wage rate that is 30 percent or more below that of their male colleagues. The researchers estimated that that a similar number of working women have been paid 30 percent or more below their male colleagues. In other words, between 10 percent and 15 percent of all working Americans have experienced discrimination. But this is still a highly conservative number. The vast majority of workers do not have a 30 percent or more pay gap with their male colleagues. As I've argued in this space before, people of all genders can be sexists, and can discriminate against one sex without much reflection. And people from all genders can be sexist, refusing to pay for the 2d92ce491b
