The teacher uses an educational technique called t'ai chi ch'uan which means 'supreme ultimate boxing.' Teachers introduce the method by showing videos of various children performing a wide range of t'ai chi ch'uan exercises and also demonstrate its use with movement in a room. Students are encouraged to focus on learning the movement of the t'ai chi ch'uan and an understanding of how to use it as a tool for self-development. The first level focuses on the development of skills in movement, sensing and perceiving, and awareness while the second level deals with the development of the learner's ability to act purposefully, think critically, and improve emotional and social competence. According to program staff the curriculum is designed to develop each student's academic, social, emotional, and physical skills. The course includes three components. The first of these components is 'Stories' which encourages the student to learn to understand others, change their own emotions, and to communicate their emotions with others. The second component is 'Action'. Students learn the skills of acting purposefully, thinking critically, taking action, interacting with others, and communicating their emotions to others. The final component is 'Cooperation'. Children are encouraged to develop cooperation skills, which involves working together to achieve a common goal. Skills such as teamwork, problem solving, discipline, working as a group, self-esteem, independence, and assertiveness are emphasized. The purpose of Street is to help children develop the following skills: Ability to communicate Ability to resolve conflicts Ability to solve problems Ability to work in a team Ability to deal with stress Ability to stay calm in difficult situations Ability to communicate well In 2003, the school was the subject of an investigation by the US Office of Civil Rights. The OCR claimed that students were being physically abused and that school administrators were aware of it. The school and parents denied the allegations and said that the children were abused by outside parties and that the school officials did not know about it. The physical abuse included teachers striking the children with sticks, hitting them with rulers, tying them up, and forcing them to lie on the floor. The superintendent of the school, Ed Taylor, resigned following the investigation. In 2010, the school was again the subject of an investigation by the OCR. The OCR found that the school may have discriminated against African Americans and Hispanic Americans. Following the investigation, the school was required to hire a staff member to work in the school's library to increase the number of f3e1b3768c
