Tumour necrosis factor alpha (TNF-alpha) and interferon gamma (IFN-gamma) are two of the proinflammatory cytokines which play an important role in the immunopathogenesis of rheumatic diseases. They are produced by activated macrophages and T cells and some soluble receptors for them are expressed on monocytes, monocyte-derived cells and peripheral blood leukocytes. It is essential to know the molecules that bind and regulate TNF-alpha and IFN-gamma to fully understand their roles in the immune response. Several studies have identified the molecules that bind these cytokines. The cytokines are heterodimers of two non-covalently associated subunits, p40 and p75. Monoclonal antibodies to the respective subunits have provided a general identification strategy for the molecules involved in cytokine function. They have also helped define the molecular basis for human genetic disorders involving this family of cytokines. The two subunits are also important targets in the clinical management of rheumatoid arthritis and other inflammatory disorders.
