download mastercam x8 full crack 32-bit 159 Thailand has rescued more than 850 tons of used cooking oil that was floating in a giant pool of liquid waste. The Department of Public Works said Tuesday that the waterlogged cargo was discovered last week by a fisherman in Prachinburi province and transported to a sewage treatment plant. The cargo contains some 726 drums, with the total weight exceeding 850 tons. The department says it may be recycled and reused as fuel. The incident highlights the difficulty of dealing with liquid waste in developing countries.

Thailand has been struggling with how to dispose of the massive waste from industries and households in a recent push to combat pollution. In January, the country's most populous province, Chonburi, will begin recycling solid waste, according to the department. Q: How to make a class able to handle pointer to itself? Let's say I have an abstract class A that the users shouldn't touch. However, the class may have some subclasses and the users may want to use their subclass A as long as they are using my class A as well. Is there any way to make it so that A can handle pointers to itself (i.e, if A has a pointer to itself, the users of the class A can get a pointer to it as well)? A: If you're willing to leave the subclasses an A* the user can call, it is absolutely possible. Here's an example in C++03: template class A { public: typedef T* Pointer; void Init(Pointer p) { p = this; } T* operator -> () const { return p; } T& operator * () const { return p; } private: static int m_counter; }; template int A::m_counter = 0; template T Foo() { return new A; } int main() { A * ip = new Foo
