Release Date: 11/01/2012.Q: Cross-browser layout, but prefer Firefox I want to make a site that will work well on both FF and IE with the same CSS. Now, using hacks as I have seen on other sites, it is possible to make a site look good in both Firefox and IE, and to me this seems pretty sloppy. I have already made the site look good in both browsers, and the hacks just seem like a really bad way to do it. What is the best way

Download SP Flash Tool v3.1328 from below link. A: Do you have the correct "scatter file"? It should look like this: AT.SP.WB 3,5 $59 EIGER NEW . . If not, please create a new one and upload it to the forum. Q: How to set up a wordpress multisite when it's already installed I have a site that I'm migrating from an older host to a new host. The host has a new hosted multisite ready to go, with the subdomains already set up (2 already set up with 2 sites). I want to use the new host's multisite setup, but I've never used one before and don't have access to the cpanel to add the subdomains to the sites, so I'm looking for a way to have one site with 2 sites, so I can start migrating the posts to the new host with the existing domain. I'm not experienced with WordPress so any help would be great. Thanks. A: To my knowledge, wordpress multisite is pretty straightforward to set up. A basic installation of wordpress will look like: root: contains the wordpress files and files of plugins and themes. sites: contains the wordpress files and files of plugins and themes of the individual sites. The sites/ subsites can be located in the root. You can have one wordpress installation at root/sites/subsite and then another at root/sites/another subsite. I guess you can say that the second root wordpress installation is inside the other one. If you are a beginner in wordpress, check out the codex: `#!/usr/bin/env bash set -e # Enables debug tracing to the console. # For more info: debug=$(grep -q`
