The rate of incorporation is proportional to the growth rate of the culture, and the amount of BrdU incorporated can be measured in terms of the optical density (OD) of the culture at the excitation wavelength. Thus, the BrdU uptake activity of the culture can be examined using OD measurement. The BrdU uptake activity of the culture is almost always higher during the exponential phase than during the stationary phase $[[@b1]]$. The BrdU uptake activity in the stationary phase of an Escherichia coli culture was measured by comparing the relationship between the BrdU uptake activity and the optical density of the culture at the fluorescence excitation wavelength. Two different approaches were used to obtain the relationships. In the first approach, the culture was diluted in order to reduce the cell density and BrdU uptake activity, and the relationship between the BrdU uptake activity and the optical density was measured. In the second approach, the culture was stopped at different time points, diluted and allowed to grow. The BrdU uptake activity of each culture was then measured, and the relationship between the BrdU uptake activity and the OD of the culture was obtained. In this study, the relationship was fitted using the sigmoidal function based on the measured data. The function was, in turn, used to predict the BrdU uptake activity of the culture. The Br
