It is a reliable and an.Q: Realtime visualization of an animation with live feedback I am trying to create a kind of a visualizer to tell me the current colour of a spherical glass surface with realtime feedback. So far I can animate a sphere and the colour of the sphere itself moves along, but I want it to be coloured differently at all points. The approach I currently am taking is to have a colour from a spectrum, that changes over time, and animates at the same time. When the sphere gets a new colour, it is defined as a factor of the difference between the colour of the sphere itself and the old colour, so: Sphere.CurrentColor = sphere.Material.Color * Sphere.ColorFactor * (currentColor - oldColor); This works, but I am facing problems with performance and it feels like there might be a more elegant way of doing this. Can you think of a way of doing this in a more performant way? (I have a spectrum of 8 colours in a 16 bit
