The Master Thesis topic should be based on a question or a challenge. It should be focused on an area of research or an interest. The topic should result in one or more (5 – 6) appropriate and relevant papers. The term "appropriate" should be interpreted broadly and would include papers that are well structured, sophisticated and well presented. The topic can be in- or out of the field or in any sub-discipline within that field. The term "relevant" should be interpreted broadly and could encompass any content related to the topic.

Successful E-Learning in Neurosurgery Through a Large-Scale Simulation Course: Evidence for the Merit of Simulation-Based Training. Training in clinical practice can be a challenge in neurosurgical education. Successful delivery of training has been shown with the use of computer-based training (CBT) which may facilitate trainees to focus on their tasks. The aim of this study was to determine the effectiveness of a CBT on a simulation-based learning program for neurosurgery residents. Overall, 25 Canadian neurosurgeons were assigned to either a computer-assisted training (CBT) or control (traditional) group. A validated CBT learning platform, the Neurolearning Learning Environment (NLE), was used and included 3 large-scale simulations with standardized patients, involving patients from different time periods, and different management strategies. One major formative evaluation and 3 benchmark and summative evaluations were conducted in each group. All evaluations were completed by the participants and/or observed by an external researcher. The posttraining NLE scores in the CBT group were significantly higher (mean [SD] scores, 3.5 [0.9] versus 2.8 [1.4];  $P = 0.025$ ) and the retention and transfer in the CBT group was higher
