Distal radioulnar joint (DRUJ) fractures occur most frequently following a fall on the outstretched hand, thus illustrating the extreme amount of force necessary to dislocate the DRUJ and produce a fracture. Most DRUJ injuries are thought to occur at the capitulum (head) of the ulna, which articulates on the dorsal distal end of the radius. There are only a few clinical situations in which DRUJ fractures occur at the sigmoid notch, which articulates with the dorsal distal end of the radius. Disruption of the DRUJ will result in tenosynovitis, fibrosis, osteoarthritis, pain, and an imbalance of the forearm muscles that leads to deformity. Occasionally, ulnar styloid fractures can occur that can cause ulnar-sided wrist pain radiating down the forearm. An ulnar styloid fracture is an open fracture, with callus formation at the distal end of the ulna, but without involvement of the ulnar sigmoid notch. A patient was referred to our hospital for treatment of a DRUJ fracture. His history and examination were significant only for a complaint of forearm pain. An in-house radiograph of the forearm (Fig 1{ref-type="fig"}) revealed a transverse fracture of the distal ulna with callus formation. No visible evidence of a DRUJ disruption was evident on the radiograph. He underwent open reduction and fixation of the DRUJ with a 4.5-mm cannulated lag screw with a K-wire parallel to the axis of the DRUJ. A close reduction was attempted but the K-wire was fixed proximal to the distal radioulnar joint and prevented a closed reduction. The patient remained comfortable and returned to work on postoperative day 8, and his forearm was well aligned and no change in the appearance of the joints. Follow-up radiographs after 3 months ([Fig

---

2](#fig2){ref-type="fig"}) showed a well-aligned radioulnar joint. Fig 1 Preoperative anteroposterior and oblique radiographs of the forearm show a transverse fracture of the distal ulna and callus formation. Fig 2 Postoperative radiographs after 3 months show a well-aligned radioulnar joint. The distal radioulnar joint (DRUJ) is the articulation between the head of the ulna and the dorsal aspect
