"HyperMotion," along with the "AI Transfer Targeting" system, translates the continuous changes and motion captured by the player on the pitch into the gameplay. However, Pro Evolution Soccer 2018, published by Konami, has been utilizing physical simulations to develop this system. "This is the most developed and advanced system of artificial intelligence in the world of football," added Meade. "We saw the benefits of the 'AI Transfer Targeting' system with PES 2017 and wanted to take that technology a step further." In the recently released trailer for FIFA 22, we see Fredy Guarin, a midfielder from the Colombian national team, making a break in front of the goal, and link with a brilliant pass to see his strike partner, James Rodríguez, run onto the ball and then in the blink of an eye, perfectly time the assist with a masterfully clever volley. In another example, a player makes a desperate tackle just as another player arrives. The motion-capture technology adjusts the player's animation to match the movement of the player he's trying to tackle. There's even a fight between two players to see who's faster to react and make the move. "We're optimistic that fans will enjoy the flexibility, intelligence and challenge that this year's game offers," concluded Meade. There are already people who are turning their 2015 PS4 hard drive on. Talk about an excuse to want to go on a self-imposed, group-hopping social media spending frenzy for a week. 2016's "Weird Al" Yankovic-led "Apocalypse" has turned out to be a successful endeavor. The 24-song album has done well thus far, with the most recent CD (and also the highest number of sales) being "Mandatory Fun" (which clocks in at #11 on Billboard's new album chart), which drops songs under the names of pop culture icons. For its first single, "Apocalypse," as it's to be known, is a parody song written by Yankovic and The Lonely Island's Andy Samberg that's poking fun at Donald Trump's claimed links with AI Gore and climate change. Using samples of Trump's presidential debates with Hillary Clinton, the song goes hard on Trump by having a refrain of "Trump is a scumbag, Hillary's a b****" coming after his "Gotcha" line. It's on par with "Springsteen on Broadway
