Q: Set up a simple, reliable

TCP/IP network This is supposed to be the shortest, easiest explanation you've ever seen on a subject as complicated as TCP/IP.

I'm trying to set up a ping-based network for the sole purpose of testing the Internet connection and for use with software that I'd like to test. Some devices that I would like to connect are: Thinkpad R400 (or any Thinkpad except T410, X201, X301) Thinkpad X200 I'm willing to work with not-so-modern equipment (preferably older models) in order to achieve a simple, reliable and well-architected networking solution. Do you have a set of considerations that you would like to address?

Some more requirements: Need to run the networking software in order to maintain control of the network. Compatibility with dynamic IP addresses. Maintenance is not a big concern, I just need a functional network.

A: Do you need to actually "ping" anything or just use it to determine your connection? If it's the latter, you can put a Windows virtual machine inside an app like VMware Player or

Virtual Box and then you can boot it up and run whatever you want while the
